RETURN TO OZ

Here we are amidst one of the most volatile precious metals markets in our lifetime. While the Tin Men (those without a heart) at central banks and COMEX endeavor to suppress prices to prop up the quickly failing fiat dollar, ETF's are now short tens of millions of ounces (fraud) because there is not enough physical silver available. Even the Scarecrow (the one without a brain) can see the light at the end of the yellow brick road.

ETF's (Electronically Traded Funds) honestly stand for Everything Terminally Flawed, or better, Eventually They Fold. SLV's current short position is over Ten (10%) Percent of annual World Silver Production! BlackRock, Inc. knows they can't find anywhere close to that amount of silver to back their shares and cover their SLV shorts, so they play the bet of shorting the market to suppress prices, which reduces their short position and puts billions in their pockets. The same happens with their spot price spoofing, and also with mining stocks. If your electronic precious metals investments are not backed by physical metals, then what do you really own? We've left plenty of room for you to write your answer here: (_).

Physical metals held IN YOUR POSSESSION will be the only way to navigate this game going forward. Our friend Ed Steer summed it up as good as anyone could with this quote:

"Despite the fact that silver has broken out to the upside -- and the silver well in London has pretty much run dry, the gold/silver ratio remains at a farcical 84.7 to 1 as of the Friday's close. The 'normal' and historical ratio is around 15 to 1...which would put silver at about $274. And if priced at the ratio of 7:1 that it comes out of the ground at… compared to gold… that would put silver at $587 an ounce. So a triple-digit silver price is in our futures -- and all that remains to be resolved is what that number will be -- and how soon 'da boyz' allow it to happen."

Read that again… A TRIPLE DIGIT SILVER PRICE! Yes, it does seem totally rational and possible, and maybe sooner than we realize. So many investors fuss over a few dollars in spot price and/or refrain from buying, thinking that spot price will see a major correction. While anything is possible, if we're looking at a potential triple digit silver price, say $100 on the low end, will it really matter if you paid $48 or $55 for that ounce of silver? The goal is to get that ounce of silver when and where you can, because as we've said on many occasions, when the music stops there will be NO silver available to purchase. ZILCH. NADA. THE BIG GOOSE EGG.

The ride upwards will be a bumpy journey for sure, and it will throw many people off the bus, but somewhere over the rainbow there's a price that we dream of that WILL become reality.

Anticipatiently,

AE
